

ABSTRACT

Existing street sewers consist of an immobile concrete structure supporting a frame. The present invention, the self-leveling street sewer, comprises a frame that floats on the foundation of the street and a tubular section that is connected to the connecting conduit. Since the frame is supported only by the street foundation, the immobile concrete structure is no longer required.